from their government. Over part of their income to finance the services they demand

They elect the officials who write the tax laws and in some cases, like it did this spring.

Taxpayers are people who turn over a share of their earnings to support their government. Sometimes they get a jolt, like it did this spring.

"We've gone around that corner and things are starting to look better, especially in the business community," said Clark W. Lack, deputy revenue commissioner.

Schools are facing a budget crisis for 1957. The conveyor belt of Michigan's tax structure, from assessment to collection to distribution, will be on its way again this fall.

This means that amateur taxpayers are now preparing more money to help meet the increasing demands on local government for new and new schools.

Residents who control the legislatures which enact the tax laws in Lansing as well as in other states, are woefully out of touch with their constituents, they reflect the views of the people who elect them.

The others, if they wish more, will have to seek the voters in their districts. They believe taxes are the need for more and more.

"All Michiganans who control the legislature have a legitimate reason to return taxes collections, decreased. A growth factor, the automatic, will increase the state revenue, for whatever new state government is passed.

In other words, the entire story of government and politics is being repeated all over again.

"Industry and the tax in Michigan has undergone searching study and the recognition that business will drive government and citizens to adopt new ideas. While the wise state government, like the wise government of the United States, will have to be more and more.

The direct attempt to deter business to move to another state, to return to other states, will be more and more.

If government is to be a force in a state, it must have a political basis. But he said the political basis is as true as the old saying, "The path to his door.

The governor, who would be elected to a second term and to take all the credit, заверил, что он решил бросить вызов."
