HEALTH TIPS

20 million undergo surgery each year

By Frank Chappell
American Medical Association

"My doctor says I need an operation."
Few words conjure up more fear and misunderstanding. People worry about anything from the size of the scar (since many measure an operation by the number of stitches) to the possibility of failing to recover. Some 20 million surgical procedures are performed each year in the United States. Most common is biopsy, in which a small bit of tissue is removed for examination in the laboratory to aid in diagnosing your problem. Next most common is dilation and curettage, in which the uterine wall is scraped. This can be for diagnostic purposes or to terminate pregnancy. The third most common is hysterectomy, in which the uterus is removed. Whether the operation is a simple diagnostic procedure or a lengthy and complicated heart repair, it is an unknown and fearful thing for most of us. Of course, no surgery should ever be taken lightly. However, in modern surgery the care of preparation, safety of anesthesia, improvements in procedure, and precise postoperative supervision have greatly reduced the pain and danger that were a part of most operations in the past, the American Medical Association points out. Except in emergencies, surgical patients go through a careful preparation period. Usually this is an overnight procedure. The skin surfaces around the site of the operation are shaved and cleansed. The lower bowel is cleansed with an enema to reduce postoperative discomfort. If food is allowed, it will be a light supper. A good sleep is assured with suitable sedatives. There may be a visit from the anesthesiologist the evening before. You may not even see the operating room. Sedation is usually started prior to wheeling the patient to surgery. In surgery, there are three areas of activity — the anesthesiologist and his assistants, the sterile operating area of the surgeon and his assistants, and the team of nurses, orderlies and aides to remove and account for used instruments, gauze packs and sponges. After the operation, depending on need, you may be taken to an intensive treatment center, recovery room, or your own hospital room. Don't expect to spend all your time in bed. Postoperative care today requires patients to get on their feet quite soon after surgery. If you are faced with surgery, don't hesitate to ask your doctor about all of the things that come to mind. An important part of his treatment is to answer your questions and reassure you.
