Warning issued on bean mold

Bean growers across the Saginaw Valley and Thumb area were cautioned last week by Greg V. Varner, the Michigan dry bean industry's director of research, to watch for potential white mold development in their bean fields.

White mold can reduce yield potential from 10 to 30 percent. Research conducted at Michigan State University has proven that white mold can be controlled by an aerial application of Benlate. MSU recommends that 1 1/2 pounds of Benlate be applied per acre between 50 percent and 100 percent of full bloom.

Rainfall during the months of June and July have created textbook conditions for the development of white mold.

Farmers with a field history of white mold should definitely consider spraying this year. The dense plant canopies and the wet conditions that have prevailed as beans progress toward blossoming are conditions that should not be ignored. Varner added.

Farmers are urged to check their fields now and if concerned about the condition of their bean crop, call their county extension office or check with the local elevator for advice on whether to spray.

New books at the library

HELEN AND TEACHER: THE STORY OF HELEN KELLER AND ANNE SULLIVAN MACY, by Joseph P. Lash (non-fiction). "The author considers the lives of two genuine American heroines, Helen Keller and "the miracle worker," Anne Sullivan Macy. Lash has undertaken the first book that treats both women in depth and gives a full rendition of their unique and touching relationship.

REAR-VIEW MIRROR, by Caroline B. Cooney (fiction). Susan Seton, while out in the countryside one day, witnesses a scene where two men next to a white station wagon are throwing a big plastic bag into the river. As she watches horrified, they attempt to put a two-year-old girl into another bag and throw her in too. Susan runs over to rescue the child and her nightmare begins.

THE EPILEPSY FACT BOOK, by Harry Sands and Frances C. Minters (non-fiction). Epilepsy is one of the most misunderstood of physical disorders, and the person who has it suffers enormously from the ignorance and prejudice he encounters. "The Epilepsy Fact Book" is addressed to those whose lives are touched by this complex illness—to persons with epilepsy, family members, teachers, and employers. Written in simple, nontechnical language, this book helps answer the questions asked by those who must deal with epilepsy as an illness and as a way of life.
