AROUND THE FARM Lots of corn stalkrot

By William Bortel

Corn stalkrot is unusually severe this year. The symptoms appearing now are prematurely drying plants that are turning brown from the top down. These symptoms have been typically described as the plants appear "blighted." Another description is the plants appear to be "frosted."

In countless fields, most plants have died. This is very unusual and is more typical of late October or early November than mid-September. In many instances, plants are blowing over or ears are on the ground. This is due to corn borer and stalkrot. These fields should be carefully watched and be the first ones to be harvested. Substantial losses occur if windy and-or rainy weather occurs. Losses of 10 to 20 percent are not unusual under these circumstances.

There are obvious differences in resistance between hybrids with some remaining green in contrast to the brown of susceptible hybrids. Farmers troubled with stalkrot this year should consider growing a less susceptible hybrid next year.

For further information on stalkrot, contact your county extension office.

New books at the library

THE KEY TO REBECCA, by Ken Follett (fiction). Follett, who hit the best-seller list with "Eye of the Needle" and "Triple," based this novel on Erwin Rommel's African campaign in World War II. Alex Wolff is a German spy who is giving the Desert Fox full details of Britain's military operations against him. Wolff's messages are sent via code based on pages from Daphne DuMaurier's novel "Rebecca." Sent to trap Wolff is William Vandam, a British major who smokes while he shaves "to relieve the boredom of the inevitable daily task." It looks like Follett has written another winner.

COUNTERPOINT, by Isabelle Holland (fiction). A call from the psychiatrist treating her hospitalized step-sister interrupts Kate Malory's well-ordered life, sending her off to play surrogate parent to a teenage niece and nephew (whom she's never met) until their father can return from abroad. Despite the children's distinctly chilly reception, Kate immediately recognizes their need for her stabilizing influence and determines to stick things out, regardless of the uncomfortable memories of her romance with their dynamic father and a series of puzzling occurrences that culminate in an attempt on her life.

A LADY OF REPUTE, by Janice James (fiction). Cecilia Ashworth, in her own words, is "two different people." To publisher Charles Forman, she is the daring Cecily Andrews, writer of the popular novels that are scandalizing 1890s London. To society, she is the elegant spinster daughter of the Ashworths, guardian of her orphaned niece, blue-stocking hostess and holder of advanced views on women's rights and the condition of the working classes. When Cecilia comes close to realizing her fondest dream, she finds an obstacle in the person of the dashing handsome House of Lords leader Lord Laurence de Ford. How Cecilia manages to reconcile her charmingly avant-garde self with the aloofly judgmental Lord de Ford makes an eminently readable romantic novel.
