FARM POULTRY

CURTAINS FOR HEN HOUSE NOT COSTLY

Commercial Feed Sacks May Be Used.

Fairly good storm curtains can be made of commercial feed sacks. Nail enough sacks to cover the space to a board at the top of the window. Then nail another board at the bottom of the sack. Then the lower board can be rolled up and fastened to the top with a loop of baling wire.

When a poultry house is not equipped with a modern ventilating system, the use of cloth curtains keeps out the rain and snow and holds in the heat in zero weather. When the bright warm sunshine appears, the curtains can be raised to permit the hens to absorb as much sunlight as possible. The large amount of fresh air which can be allowed to enter through the open front helps to keep the walls and litter dry and make healthful conditions for the hens.

The closed front and the modern ventilating system is undoubtedly best for the poultry, but many farm poultry owners have houses of the old type with plenty of glass windows and no means of ventilation. Constant attention and a few cloth curtains may improve the conditions in such houses. In many cases, funds for the remodeling of a farm poultry house are not available. The financial cost of improvements must often be close to zero so that cash funds can be used for taxes and necessary living expenses.—Michigan Farmer.

Ultra-Violet Rays and Cod-Liver Oil Advised

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.)

Irradiation with ultra-violet rays, as well as feeding cod-liver oil, improves the general condition of hens deprived of sunlight and green feed and promotes egg production. Exposure to sunlight is equally beneficial and is easier and much cheaper throughout most of the year. All three treatments supply vitamin D, and anti-rachitic vitamin that facilitates the assimilation of calcium and phosphorus in the hen's body, thus developing bone and shell.

Tests with 90 Rhode Island Red pullets at the United States Department of Agriculture experiment farm, Beltsville, Md., showed that both irradiation with ultra-violet rays and administration of cod-liver oil as supplements to an ordinary diet for birds confined without access to sunlight or green feed increased egg production and thickness of egg shells. Each of these vitamin supplements also tended to give heavier eggs and to improve the hatchability of the eggs. The cod-liver oil has a marked effect on the live weight of the birds, but the irradiation did not.

Hatchability of Eggs

Hatchability of eggs depends more on the breeding of the hens than on the number of eggs they lay, according to poultry experts of the United States Department of Agriculture. Records show that in breeding tends to decrease hatchability and outbreeding tends to increase it. They also indicate high egg production during the breeding season promotes good hatching, though many poultrymen believe that heavy egg production at this season decreases hatchability.

Feed for Pullets

Pullets should use about 25 pounds of feed per day. The proportion of mash and scratch grain will vary from equal parts of grain and mash up to two parts of grain and one of mash. The total amount consumed is the important thing. Any attempt to increase consumption of mash by eliminating grain should be done cautiously. It is important that hens maintain their body weight, and rather heavy feeding of grain will help to do this.—American Agriculturist.

POULTRY HINTS

Even-sized chicks thrive best; do not mix different ages and expect the youngest to get along well.

It is not advisable to hold eggs for hatching purposes more than ten days before putting them in the incubator.

Bacillary white diarrhea is due to bacillary infection; common diarrhea is due to digestive disturbances or chilling of the chick.

The Pekin duck has a creamy white plumage and a long, broad and deep body with a full breast and deep keel. There is an ideal body formation for a market bird.

In 92 New York state poultry flocks the average mortality was 23 per cent. Flock depreciation is the third greatest expense in producing eggs, and dead hens are responsible.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By Charles E. Dunn

The Christian and World Peace. Lesson for November 6th.

Psalm 72:9-17; Ephesians 2:13-19.

Golden Text: Matthew 5-9.

The early Church was against war, but with the conversion of Constantine, it became war minded, later glorifying in the bloody Crusades. The Church of Rome drew a distinction between just and unjust wars which was carried forward by the Reformation. Most Christians supported the World War. But since the Armistice a great change has taken place. The Churches, now sensible of the horror, futility, and insanity of war, are rendering splendid service to the peace cause through local committees, and national commissions, including that of the interdenominational Federal Council. There is also an international organization, the World Alliance, now operating in thirty-six countries.

The fight for peace bids fair to be one of the major struggles of history. It will demand extraordinary skill, wisdom and patience. The war makers will die hard, for behind them are centuries of tradition. The peace movement is in its infancy. Yet remarkable progress has already been made.

The fundamental problem is not so much to prevent war, as to get the nations together. This has been impressively accomplished by the League of Nations, which may be considered mankind's greatest step forward; by the World Court, which Chief Justice Hughes calls "the most important of all undertakings for peace"; and by the Briand-Kellogg outlawry of war Pact, a declaration of momentous significance.

But many formidable problems remain unsolved. Very little progress has been registered in the direction of disarmament. Indeed the world today is more heavily armed than ever before.

Nevertheless the conscience of Christendom is so aroused over the crucial issue of peace, upon the settlement of which the whole future civilization depends, that we can say with Emerson, "War is on its last legs." It is certain to go the way of crucifixion, polygamy and slavery. Both the spirit of Jesus and the collective common sense of humanity are against it. The peace makers will finally prevail, for they are indeed God's children.

Limitation on Offices

The phrase "third term" usually is interpreted to refer to the Presidency. There is no law against a third term as President, but the example of Washington and subsequent accumulated tradition frown on it. However, the state of Delaware forbids by statute a third term for its governors. The constitutions of 17 states contain provisions limiting consecutive service of govern-

Got Name by Accident

The name of the so-called Governor Winthrop desk with the slant-top, according to the New York Sun, originated with the Clark Furniture company of Boston. This firm, desiring a trade name for their new desk, settled quite appropriately on Governor Hancock desk, but the printer labeled it Governor Winthrop by mistake, and the name stuck.
